How Animals Protect Themselves

by Jonathan Moran

I recently saw a picture of an Arctic fox, an animal that is brown in summer and white in winter. The white fur is a kind of self-protection—it makes the animal difficult to see in the snow. Then I started wondering about what else animals do to protect themselves. So, I interviewed Kathy Grey, a biologist who works at the Fremont Zoo.

- 5 I'm interested in how animals protect themselves. For example, what are some things they do to survive through a cold winter?

Well, you probably know about bears—they eat a lot in the spring and summer, and then they sleep through winter. But you may not know about the Alaskan wood frog. This frog can actually freeze up to 10 two-thirds of its body. For as long as seven months, it feels like a block of ice—it's completely still. But it's not dead. When the weather warms up, it comes back to life.

That's amazing. What about protection from attack? Lions have big teeth and turtles have shells, but can you give me any more unusual examples?

- 15 Well, one of the craziest examples is another frog—the hairy frog. It's also called the horror frog because of the frightening thing it does to protect itself. If this frog is attacked, it breaks its own toe bones and sticks the sharp points through its skin. Then it uses those sharp points like claws!

Wow! Frogs are such amazing creatures! Are there any other animals that use tricks to protect themselves?

- 20 Certain kinds of geckos also do something interesting. Their tail looks like their head. When another animal attacks the gecko, it may accidentally bite the tail off instead of the head. And the gecko just runs away and grows a new tail!

OK, well, let's end with that interesting example! Thank you for talking to me today.

- 1. Why did the interviewer start wondering about how animals protect themselves?
 - a. He saw a picture of an Arctic fox.
 - b. He heard about an interesting frog.
 - c. He met a biologist from the Fremont Zoo.
- 2. Why would the wood frog's leg break off if you moved it?
 - a. because its bones are thin
 - b. because it's frozen solid
 - c. because it can grow a new one
- 3. Why is the hairy frog called the horror frog?
 - a. because it attacks with sharp teeth
 - b. because it sticks bones in its skin
 - c. because it is covered with hair
- 4. What is unusual about the gecko's tail?
 - a. It falls off once a year.
 - b. Attackers cannot bite it off.
