Mindfulness is best defined as “paying attention in a particular way; on purpose, in the present moment, and non-judgmentally.”

Jon Kabat-Zinn

You can be mindful in two main ways by:

- doing simple practices (meditations) but also
- being completely in the moment enjoying something simple like eating your lunch so you really taste and appreciate it rather than just gulping it down.

Neuroscience is helping us understand how our brains work and the effect mindfulness can have upon it. Mindfulness can be used in two ways to help prepare for exams.

One of the most simple mindfulness practices is focusing in on your breath. This helps create a sense of calm which is great for reducing worry and also helps increase your focus and memory and helps you to make better, more skilful decisions.

Get ready for meditation

Find a quiet place to sit where you won’t be disturbed and switch your phone to silent.

- Choose a chair that is comfortable. Ensure your feet are touching the floor, hands resting on your knees, back supported by the chair. Keep your shoulders back so you’re sitting upright with your head looking forwards.
- Close your eyes and allow your focus to come to your breath. You don’t need to breathe in any different way. Just to be aware of how you are breathing.

Start the meditation

Once you’ve set up to do the practice you can then play the recording (it lasts just under 10 minutes). Click here and listen.

After the meditation

After you have played it reflect about your experience.

- Was it easy to do?
- Was there much mind wandering?
- What else was going on?

Try to practise this for 10 minutes every day. Find a regular time that works. Bit by bit you should start to notice yourself becoming calmer.

The most important thing is to give it a go and explore with a sense of openness and curiosity.
