When all the elements of learning are aligned to a theory of learning, a well-designed interim assessment can be used by teachers to personalize instruction in the classroom and by schools and districts administrators for monitoring progress.