

Author conversations

On feedback from educators

Eric Gaze

Bowdoin College

It's like infinite content that you can put in the digital environment versus that static — the old school textbook. And so that definitely is a huge win.

Seriously, the moment when I was most proud — it happens a lot when I visit community colleges, when I speak at conferences. And faculty come up to me, and they'll thank me for putting together the materials. For putting together the curriculum in a thoughtful way. In a way that Pearson absolutely has been able to help make it be sort of the best product for these faculty members. And they'll say, 'Thank you that you've come up with this curriculum that really is meaningful for my students, that's giving my students tools to help them be successful.'

And so, that's great! I mean, when you hear it from other faculty. When you hear it from students, I mean sometimes you don't know if the students are just saying that to be nice. But you know, faculty — that's real, I think, when they thank you.

www.pearson.com