

>> Today's definition of student success is changing. Eighty-five percent of college freshmen like me are pursuing a higher education to obtain a good job. And focus on academics alone is no longer enough. I need career support to be ready to today's workplace. I want the college I choose to help me prepare for my future to better understand where I want to go, how I will get there, and what it will take to stand out from the crowd. This means connecting my experiences inside and outside the classroom to life after college. My future employers are looking for skills like communication, critical thinking, creativity, and collaboration. And they're expecting me to demonstrate what I have learned throughout my lifetime of career success however I define it.
