

Speaker 1: When I was little, I wanted to go to law school. It was my first Christmas, my mother told me that Santa Claus was coming in to bring me a present and I said we should call the police because it's not nice to break into people's houses.

I am very interested in working in politics. Unexpected skills that have helped me in high school. I worked for a while as a hostess and then as a server. You always have to be polite and calm and even headed. I didn't realize what a great asset that was until my first internship. Part of my job was to answer phones and get yelled at by constituents for like 20 minutes at a time and you just had to sit there and be really polite.

The future of my industry I think is going to be really exciting because of the different technologies that get applied to politics. I mean social media has a great ability to bring information to constituencies. The internships that I've been doing. We use social media on behalf of candidates and on behalf of people already in office to advertise for things like town halls. To advertise for any new policies they're fighting for and explain any issues and platforms that they think are really important.

The majority of the country want to see a more peaceful country and the only way to move forward is if we work together. So 10 year plan, I would like to be in DC. I would like to be working in politics. I mean, no resolution is ever going to have everything that every person possibly could want, but politics is a compromise and how you compromise and learning to compromise for the greater good. I think there's something beautiful in that.
