

>> Okay. So, what has happened on my campus and how is that affecting me?

^M00:00:07

So, the university of Louisville has now decided to go completely online for the remainder of our semester. Originally it was just going to be two weeks, but just two days ago we got the notice that it is actually going to be for the remainder of the semester, and I think that that's happening at a lot of campuses across the nation right now. I would say it's, you know, undoubtedly hard not to think about all of the events that have had to be cancelled, and you know, the moments that we aren't going to get to share on campus. But, ultimately I'm trying to put it all in perspective, because I recognize, you know, that those events were cancelled with our health and safety in mind. And that the most important thing right now is that I'm getting to spend some time with my family and that I'm, you know, safe and healthy and that I'm helping others to, you know, stay safe and healthy as well. So, I think that's what's you know, most important. And I'm really proud of the way that university has handled this transition. You know, they're working really hard to credit students who weren't able to use, you know, that housing and dining money that they originally paid. And they are making accommodations for those individuals that need to use our campus as their home, even though the majority of us are going to be moving out.

^M00:01:22

In terms of online learning, I would say that I'm feeling, you know, pretty prepared, and I really just recognize how much, you know, diligence and self-motivation it's going to take at this point, and how much students and professors are going to have to work together to, you know, make the most of the rest of this semester and our new learning environment.