

>> Okay, so what is the sentiment from my friends and peers?

^M00:00:05

I would say that, if there's one word that I could use to describe the way that we're all feeling right now it would be uncertain. There is so much uncertainty surrounding our academic and our everyday lives right now.

^M00:00:21

As college students, I think that we so often, you know, have a lot of structure to our lives. We have scheduled class times, and our clubs and organizations that we participate in. And all of that has been cancelled. So, our lives today are looking so different from the way that they looked just a week ago. And I really feel that, they're, you know, going to look different a week from now as well. So, I think right now is a time to start to learn how to adapt to our virtual environment, to think about the ways that we're going to learn digitally, and to really prioritize being there for one another, even if we can't be physically present, and thinking of the ways that are best to do that.

^M00:01:04

I would say that students right now are most worried about moving to a digital learning environment in the sense that they might not feel that their professors are fully equipped to do that. I think that professors who are already using a virtual component are going to be at a huge advantage, because it's going to be easier to move that content to an online platform when you already have that platform there for you. I think we're more worried about the professors that were really using that full class time and the ability to lecture and be in person to, you know, deliver the majority of our content. And I think it's just going to need to be students and professors working together and using the resources that are out there to make the best of this new environment.