

>> What is your advice for the listener?

^M00:00:04

I think it's a really hard time to give advice right now when we're all going through this -- at our own pace in our own way. But I think with that being said, the most important thing to remember is that we are not alone.

^M00:00:11

^M00:00:20

If you feel alone, talk to a professor, a peer, a friend, or a family member. Those are the individuals that are going to get me through this time. I was actually emailing a professor just yesterday about our first online class. And she said that the best part about it was that she didn't have to wear shoes.

^M00:00:39

and I think that, you know, humor and unity are going to get us through this. That's what we need even if it has to be delivered virtually. I would say to anyone who feels that they're not prepared to take some time, to look at the resources that are available to you. You know, explore this hub that you're probably watching the video on right now. See what free resources educational technology companies have to offer you. And if you have questions, if you find yourself stumped or confused, reach out to your professors, or to tech support. We have great tech support, so many companies do, individuals that want to help you succeed, and don't want you to be struggling with online learning. Nobody wants you to struggle alone. I would say to, you know --

^M00:01:28

Find a time to sit down each day and to learn, prioritize your education now more than ever with the time that you have. And honestly, we are ready for virtual learning, Pearson's digital first movement was the first step in creating content that individuals can use to learn at their own pace, on their own time, and virtually.

^M00:01:52

And I think that it's important that students recognize that these resources do exist if only you're willing to take the time to find them and be willing to use them.